the three horns of the Great Slave Lake: and westward across the Rocky mountains through the whole region of the Oregon territories, spreading to a vast distance along the shores of the North Pacific. The date of this visitation he does not mention. Lewis & Clarke supposed that it had swept the Columbia some thirty years before their arrival, or about the year 1780, since when there have been several returns, the last in 1852-1853, when the Coast tribes particularly were ravaged. To these imported disorders, the measles is probably to be added, which is scarcely less fatal than the others. The great mortality produced by Congestive Fever between 1820-1830, upon the Columbia has been mentioned by various writers. This the Indians, though doubtless erroneously supposed to have originated from an American vessel. Among those strictly their own, Consumption is one of the most destructive in regard to their carelessness to the slight shelter from rain and exposure, permitted by their wandering habits, and the dampness of the climate for a large part of the year, rendering it exceedingly common, and it seems to have become the more so, since the partial change in their habits by association with the whites. A very common eruptive disorder, attacking the throat, and commonly supposed to be a form of syphilis has been recognized by Dr. C. M. Hitchcock, late Surgeon U. S. Army, as the "Yaws" very common in the
