Litchfield October 14th 1804

My Dear friend

In addition to numerous other obligations, and friendships I have to acknowledge an affectionate epistle of yours that I [illegible] not comply with your request in regard to visiting you - but my Husbands business was more pressured by our taking a tour towards New York - the kind solicitude you ever express for my welfare excites the most pleasing emotions, and calls for my warmest gratitude, and I dwell upon those evidences of your affection so flattering to my feelings, with a spirit of Mistaky attachment. I flattered myself you might find it convenient to pass some time with me before I left Litchfield but the time is now so far advanced - that I begin to despair of that pleasure - but as a compensation for this disappointment I will insist upon your making your calculations to pay me a visit in New York in the middle of the winter - I have set my heart upon it, and you must give my love to Mr Hoyt and tell him it must be so - I hope you will acquiesce in my wishes with that readiness that you have ever shewn to gratify me -
