Klikatats and Nisquallies by the same name
A-yah-hose is a demon half deer and half snake with two heads and two pair of horns. He lives every where in the mountains and bears the same name both with the Klikatats and Nisquallies

Kwak-wa-stai-mewh. These are a little people who live to the North. They eat the haiqua, the shape of their mouths, or rather perhaps beaks, allowing them to pull the meat from the shells. Beds of these shells lie round their lodges like those of clams round the houses of the Sound Indians. Their flesh is proof against knives or arrows, but is vulnerable by feathers and in their wars with the geese &c they got pierced with them. In the story of the "Seal Hunters" given below, these beings figure. An Indian informed me that in his father's time there was a slave among the S'Homanish who had lived with them and cured many of their wounded with gum. They are notwithstanding their size very strong, and one of them can paddle a great canoe by himself and catch it full of salmon halibut and sturgeon.

Mo-kwa-tah-oom, are the inhabitants of the land of bones, or the dead world, These are described in a Staktamish legend.

Hweh-kwa-deh of the Sound Indians, Náh-ween-ab-hlah of the Klikatats is the thunder bird, the sound of whose wings produces the noise.
