He has sometimes been seen by the medicine men. He is very fierce, casting fire at whatever he is angry with, whether men or animals, rocks or trees. There is supposed to be but one. The Klikatats say that a long time ago the Nez Percés made a large hole in the ground and filled it with water, which they heated by stones, a great many persons, several tens were sitting around it when the fire came and they all died. The figure of the bird in the act of carrying off a whale has been already mentioned.
St-plah (Klikatat) are a gigantic race, having very long hair. They are of both sexes. They inhabited lakes and when they saw any one looking down into the water, rose suddenly, seized and took them down

Among the Stakhamish a race of demons inhabited the lakes called Fisah, which seemed to be the same as the Jugwa or Zugwa, of the Skiqualies. Whether identical with the St-plah or not, I cannot say, Kelo-camish, or Kesloh-cumsh, gigantic hunters, inhabiting the Cascade Range and known to both Klikatats and sound Indians. In one of the Snohomish tales, they are connected with the story of the deluge.

Among local tales of the upper Chehalis, relating to the Fisahs, the following will serve as specimens, given me by S. S. Ford, Esq.
