The Walletaeh.
(Klikatat.)

Walletaeh had a son born to him and he once invited every one to come to a feast, and had a great deal of singing and dancing. Among those present were five Skookooms women from beyond the sea (or where the surf breaks.) One of these said to the mother, "See my breast is sick, it is so full of milk, lend me your child to suckle and I will give it back to you". So she took it, and she and five sisters slipped off secretly, and carried it with them. Walletaeh and his people searched everywhere for the child, till at last he concluded it had been stolen by Skookooms. The sisters took the child to their house, where it grew and became a man, and they fed him on frogs, which were their food. By and by, he became a man, and of great stature, and he said to himself, how is it, that I am different from these people. They are black, and I am white. One day when he was making arrow heads, the blue jay came to him and stood talking. He threw the chips of stone, that he had in his hand at the jay, and a piece struck him in the eye. The jay said to him "Why do you treat me so, when I come to talk to you, and tell you about your relations"? Take the stone out of my eye and I will tell you all about them". He did so and the jay told him how he had been stolen, and that the Saugia which he had on at the time
