refused them. The congaie daughter had seen and fallen in love with him, and she had in the same way refused all the young men of the county. She determined to catch him and changed herself into one of the deer. When he saw the deer, he shot intending to strike it behind the foreleg: but she caught the arrow under her arm and stopped it, so that the head protruded in front, and the feathers behind. She pretended to be wounded badly, and ran over a hill, leaving a trace of blood. The young man followed and reaching the summit, saw no deer, though there was nothing to hide one; but a woman standing by the water side, with her head bent down washing and combing her hair, which was long and reached to the ground. He said to himself "There is a woman standing, perhaps she has seen my deer." So he called to her "Nah! have you seen a deer pass by." She did not answer till he called the fifth time, when she looked up laughing and said "Why don't you come nearer? Are you afraid? See! I have no fur on my skin, I am not a Skokoom. If you don't come nearer I won't tell you about your deer". He came a little nearer, but she still told him to approach. At length he came up to her when she ordered him to come close to her, to put his face so as to touch hers. He was bashful
