great chief also and had a great deal of property. He knew every thing (by intuition as in "second sight") and knew how to make every thing. His father became jealous of him and considered in his heart how to kill him, lest his son should become a greater chief than himself. So one night, while the son was lying asleep in his bunk, wrapped in his robe, the father took a long knife and cut his head off filling the whole house with his blood. He then called the boys mother, and pretending astonishment, asked who had done it, what people had killed his son. She knew who it was but did not reply, for her heart was gone. Then the father said: "In the morning I will send every where, and find who has done this". But she answered, "You need not, for you did it yourself." "Now look out for me, for you will not see where I am going". She immediately slipped through a crack in the floor, and went down and into the water. By and bye, the father heard it thunder and became afraid, saying to himself that perhaps the Chief above would do to him, as he had to his son: that perhaps he would even overturn the world. So he took his son's head and put it on again, and leaped backwards and forwards over him five times, and his son came to life again. The father then asked him five times,