knew every thing, even in the womb. Spirit advised to throw him into the water; but he left him and went into the mountains. He had now two wives, the Dove, and his sister. Those two and himself were the only people on the earth. Joseph met a man entirely white, not merely his skin, but his hair and beard, although he was young, and said to him, "Ah! my brother, I am pleased to meet you. Come home to my house". But the young man did not answer. Joseph then asked, where had come from, but received no reply, until he had repeated his question five times, when he said, "From above". He asked in like manner, five times what his name was, and the stranger then told him Hoh-hoke (the raven) which was then white. Hoh-hoke told Joseph that he could not go to his house, he was travelling every where to look for people. Joseph answered that besides him, his mother and sister there were no people. Hoh-hoke still refused to go with him; but asked in turn what Joseph's name was. This he did not know, and the other then told him to take his name. They parted, and Joseph in going home, saw five female mice (hool-hool) and three crickets? (klik-elk) He took them to his house and his mother, the Star, asked him where he had found those people. He replied, "in the mountains" and that he wished to have ten wives in order to beget children rapidly. The young man was now a great
