these men were altogether dangerous, it is said.* What they had on them was all that they had. They set out, the men who dwelt there, then they came to them on the shore. Whence comes this smell of men that we perceive? said they. On this side, come then, said they. They gave some goods. From there they embarked, still towards men who dwelt, they arrived. Then the two ~~Lousheup~~ squint eyed went to their cabin. Setting out from there again lower down (the river) they went. Towards the men from there who dwell having arrived, they were black men. Thence they set out again, on the river they set out, again they arrived among men who dwelt there, they were white men. Then from there on a river which comes from heaven, they set out, it is said. a river which flows from heaven, by that they set out, they came to men. the men among whom they arrived were red. Having arrived there they set out, and where they arrived, the men of there yellow. towards, they arrived. There the elder brother remained the younger embarked with the others. During that time, the men (the kindred of the travellers) did not know what was happening. Then every time that they passed among men, they gave some goods; they returned on the river, returning they passed back among the men whom they first seen, and arriving there they gave them some goods. Then there where they had made the great canoe to that side they returned. Having arrived there, then they sought their kindred. When they first set out, they were little boys, it is said; when they returned to their kindred the elder his hair was entirely white, it is said. His younger brother, his hair half white, half black. Having returned there they no longer recognized anyone. They saw many people and recognized no one. There one very old woman and man dwelt, towards them they went. Our children, two young men set out, they said. The men sought them diligently, but not at all, they said always. We do not know what became of them, said they. Then how were they called, said they. Enethekwi bejaze†, they were called, said they. ~~We~~ Those are ~~the~~ we, said the young men.

* Dangerous is not the literal meaning, it would be powerful or wicked

† The old man his son.
