It would seem that there is a valley lying to the west of the range bordering Hoods Canal: there seems to be no doubt. Mr Thomas Mackay an old trapper Hoodsis bay trapped, it is said used to hunt there and reported the existence of prairie country and small lakes, is reported but no persons of whom now living in the Terrd that all have visited it. According to the best information A high range of hills extends along the western edge of the canal, closely approaches it, as far as the head of Hood sect a bold sied inlet where it appears to drop off. It closely approaches the water & as is said. leaves no passage for a road between. Beyond this range is another highe one which is believed to extend as far north as near the head of Port Discovery and thence follows the streets of Juca where it bends, & continued towards Cape Flattery, & Still further west is the main Olympian range which meets it at that point. Between the first & second ranges there would seem to be a continuous valley, extending from the Chehalis to Port Townsend & drained at its southern extremity by a branch of the Sko-komish which runs into Hoods Canal. Between the second and third, if the discription is correct, there must also be a basin, probably a mountainous & broken one, drained at its southern extremity by a branch of the Snoquilt, & at its northern, perhaps by the Elk-wheh which runs into the streets of Juca. Vague Indian rumor mentions a large lake in this
