changing the sisters to Wheet-wheet or sandpipers.

After this he travelled up the river till he became hungry and wished for some thing to eat. so he consulted his own sisters whom he always carried in his belly, taking them out when he wanted their advice, as they were very wise. They told him to catch some salmon and eat them. The salmon were now running; Spilyai stopped at a point of land projecting into the river and called the salmon "Come my people, I made you, and you are my people. I am very hungry, have pity on me." So the salmon rushed towards the shore and he extended his paws, but they jumped over them, splashing his face with water and he caught none. He made five ineffectual attempts as he went along, at one time trying to haul his blanket like a seine. but they still escaped him. Becoming very hungry he again took out his sisters. They were quite angry, being cold, and were cross with him, whereon he blew into the air, ordering it to snow. Then they became frightened and told him to go to a sand spit and take a stick, and as the salmon passed, to strike them on the back of the head. Upon this he suffered the women to return and did as he was told. He killed two salmon, split them, spread them with sticks and set them up before the fire to roast. As he watched them he fell asleep and the grey wolf (hâh-lish) came
