at a blow. It flew over, and fell on the other side of the mountains, and became Tahoma. or Mt. Adams. Weeit then stamped on his neck, and rounded it off, as it now is. Pahtoo was not killed. His heart remained strong, and when Weeit returned home, he thought to himself, he would serve his other brother in the same way. He therefore went to Wacheum and addressed him. "My youngest brother, Why are you always behaving so badly to your people, taking their women to sleep with?" Wacheum did not answer, but said to himself," What has he been to see me? I have not seen him anywhere"? Pahtoo then struck Wacheum's head off. which flew and lit in the Winatchapeum country, at the head of the river. and he stamped on his neck in the same way as had been done to himself. Not satisfied with this however. Pahtoo, after days returned home, and made a bow and twenty arrows, straight and strong. He took these and his knife, and went to Weeit. The latter it seems after cutting his brothers head off, had stolen his son and taken him with him. He found the elevation or shoulder of the old crater on the south side. The anger of Pahtoo was increased at seeing his son; but he dissembled and addressed Weeish, another old subject of binding the head
