and the innocent & classes. Seward's infatuation surprises every one for he certainly was not deceived as to the opinion of the people. What an extra ordinary tenacity of office he has. He rushed back here to work the moment he had laid his daughter in the grave, with the same vigor he had shown before—Calamities that would have overwhelmed any one else, seem to have made no impression on a frame apparently fragile, or an ambition that one would have expected to wither under them.
Miss Seward's death was greatly lamented here, and the utmost sympathy felt for her family. She seems to have been a singularly pure & lovely character—.
