from the information I could obtain, are as follows.

"At Nepawi and South branch House, about thirty tents of the Kristenaux, or ninety warriors, and sixty tents of Stone Indians or Assiniboins, who are their neighbours, and are equal to two hundred men; their hunting grounds extend upwards to about the Eagle Hills.

Next to them are those who trade at Forts Image and Augustus and are about eighty tents or upwards of Kristenaux; on either side of the river, their number may be two hundred. In the same country are one hundred and forty tents of Stone Indians; and quite half of them inhabit the west woody country, the others never leave the plains, and their numbers cannot be less than four hundred & fifty men.

At the southern headwaters of the north branch dwells a tribe called Sarsees, consisting of about thirty fire tents, or one hundred and twenty men.

Opposite to these, eastward, on the head waters of the South branch are the Piccanny, to the number of four twice fifteen hundred men. Next to them on the same water are the Blood Indians, of the same language as the last, to the number of about fifty tents or two hundred and fifty men. From them downwards extend the Blackfeet Indians, of the same nation as the two last tribes; their number may be eight hundred men.

Next to them, and who extend to the confluence of the South and North branch, are the Fall or Big bellied Indians, who may amount to about six hundred warriors."

The Stone Indians here are the same people as the Stone Indians or Assiniboins who inhabit the river of that name already described, and both are detached tribes from the Nadowasis who inhabit the western side of the Mississippi, and lower part of the Missouri.

The Fall or Big bellied Indians are from the South eastward also, and of a people who inhabit the plains from the North
