I am tired of it, you may be sure,) but because it will leave me so short a time to see London in. I am also afraid it will not give me time to get a suit of clothes made, as even if I still have enough money left to pay for them, while Paris is an awfully expensive place to visit for a short time, although I believe that a family could live much more cheaply than in America.

I have about finished up all the principal "sights" here, although the examination which I have been able to make of them has been in most cases a very superficial one. Still I have never been able, and I think I have seen much more than many other travellers would have seen in the same time. The day before yesterday I visited Sevres, the place where the celebrated porcelain of that name is made. I was shown all through the workshops and saw all the different stages in the manufacture of plates &c. I then visited the museum where specimens of the ware are on exhibition, they were all for sale, although I suppose it is needless to add that I did not invest in any. Some of the work was simply exquisite, and if I had had the money I would surely have gotten something for you. I returned to Paris
